November 10, 2018 / Dave Taylor / Instagram Help, Most Popular / 25 Comments I went to check Instagram this morning and got an unusual login attempt warning! What's going on? First, don't be scared. Instagram has some pretty skillful built-in security tests, so when it sees you sign in from a remote location or see attempting to log in to your account, can trigger this unusual login attempt or suspicious login attempt condition. In both cases, Instagram sees that something atypical has happened and wants to make sure everything is okay. In fact, you should be grateful that Instagram is trying to help you make sure you don't lose your account access to some nefarious hacker, probably around the world! Which doesn't alleviate that feeling of panic, I know. So let's go through the simple steps of dealing with the unusual login attempt and then tighten the security of your Instagram account once we're done. First of all, here's a warning I saw appear on my own Instagram account: Pretty sure I haven't visited Moscow in the last few weeks - or never, really - so this is definitely a Russian hacker trying to get into my account. Or, most likely, some program that is trying to split into thousands of accounts simultaneously. Either way, definitely not good! Since it wasn't me trying to access my account from Moscow, I'm going to play the blue This Wasn't Me. This ensures that Instagram continues to protect my account against Russian login attempts. It also now asks me to change my account password: I strongly encourage you to use a password manager or otherwise track your passwords in a secure file or document; otherwise you will succumb to the common strategy of using the same password on multiple, or even dozens of sites. If any of them are compromised, then all their accounts will be open to piracy. Remember, good passwords have uppercase and lowercase letters, digits, and some punctuation marks. I've been using completely random passwords generated by 1Password, so they don't have any patterns or even rely on mnemonics. Essentially impossible to guess. Enter your new highly complex, it has never been used in any other site password twice, then tap Submit. You should be all fixed, although you might be asked to log in to your account again from scratch by entering the account name/email/phone number and your new password. Make sure nothing has been compromised when you go to your account information page. Mine is clear: If Instagram reports that your account is frozen or blocked, make sure you're not using a VPN on your mobile device, as they can show you how to bounce around the world, which is highly suspicious for their algorithms. Also try going to the Instagram website to log in via a web browser – then reset your password. Doesn't any of that work? Well, now you're in uncharted territory and you should go to the Instagram support center to get help. Good luck. If you're signed back in and everything's fine, which may be the case, it's time to improve the security of your account. You've already chosen a better – and unique – password, but you should turn on 2-factor authentication for your Instagram account! This means that even if someone has their password they still can't sign in without knowing the temporary temporary security code sent by text message to your phone. For you, it's easy, but for anyone else, they're stopped by the cold. Here's my tutorial on how to enable 2-factor authentication on Instagram. Just do it.
